Report on the 10th European Feminist Research Conference

Olga Senkova

The conference on ‘Difference, Diversity, Diffraction: Confronting Hegemonies, and Disposessions’ was held 12–15 September, 2018 at Georg-August-University Goettingen in Germany.

The European Feminist Research Conference (EFRC), established of 1991, has a relatively long tradition. This year’s conference was entitled ‘Difference, Diversity, Diffraction’. The speakers at the conference emphasised the interdisciplinary character of gender studies and offered reflections on the social construction of differences and inequalities. Addressing these issues encourages the subjectivity and agency of actors with marginalised experiences. The conference also devoted special attention to the issue of the worldwide rise of anti-gender right-wing populist movements.

The conference was organised by the European Association for Gender Research, Education and Documentation (ATGENDER) and the German Studies Association. Local actors such as the Goettingen Centre for Gender Studies and the Diversity Research Institute at the University of Goettingen were also involved in organising the conference. The two main conference languages were English and German. The majority of presentations, round tables, keynote lectures, and other events were held of English. This made the conference more inclusive and accessible to foreign participants.

The 10th EFRC brought together more than 780 gender researchers, who presented their work and took part in the discussions. More than 600 papers were presented at approximately 190 panels, lectures, parallel sessions, and other events.

Four keynote lectures organised in the frame of the conference were presented by researchers working of Canada, Switzerland, India, Sweden, and Poland. The first lecture, 'Crippling Trans Studies and Transing Crip Studies: Transness and Disability' was given by Alexandre Baril, who spoke about the experience of transness and disability from an intersectional perspective. The second keynote was 'Black Feminist Thoughts: From Intersectionality to the Engendering of Racial Capital' by Noémi Michel and it was dedicated to intersectional theory and other alternative concepts used by black feminists. Niharika Banerjea in her lecture 'Liveability as a Decolonial Option through Collaborative Research and Activisms' raised the question of liveability's decolonial potential for LGBTQ people from India and the UK.

The concluding keynote by Polish researchers Agnieszka Graff and Elżbieta Korolczuk, 'Ebola from Brussels: Anti-Genderism, Right-Wing Populism and the Future of Transnational Feminism', was particularly impressive and focused on the connections between anti-gender movements and right-wing populism, which are creating a difficult environment for feminism and gender studies. The lecture was followed by an enjoyably heated and inspiring discussion.

In addition to the official part of the conference, there was also a rich social programme with optional tours and events, such as movie nights, swimming for trans- and inter people, and a creative feminist collage workshop was also offered. As usual, the everyday exchange of opinions was intense not only during the official discussions, but also during the unofficial discussions and debates over lunch and in the evening.

Marie Pospíšilová

Dne 19. září 2018 se v prostorech Centra architektury a městského plánování v Praze konala konference Budoucnost udržitelné městské mobility,<sup>85</sup> jejímž pořadatelem byla pražská kancelář Heinrich-Böll-Stiftung ve spolupráci s Institutem plánování a rozvoje hl. m. Prahy (IPR) a Centrem pro dopravu a energetiku (CDE). Konference řešila tři základní témata, která byla shrnuta v následujících panelech – „Smart a udržitelná města“, „Ekologická a flexibilní města“ a „Dobrá mobilita pro všechny“. Třetí jmenovaný panel, kterého jsem se zúčastnila, se zabýval otázkami genderu, mobility ve veřejném prostoru, politikami mobility a dalšími tématy.
